Note that the following is true: if α is any one of (9)–(11), (12)–(16), (21), (22), (23) or (24), then α may well be replaced by α^* (except in the case of β and γ), provided that the letter “D” is to be used

Numerical results are reported in Table 1. The first column is labeled 'Question' and contains the question number. The second column is labeled 'Response' and contains the number of responses for each question. The third column is labeled 'Percentage' and contains the percentage of responses for each question. The fourth column is labeled 'Mean' and contains the mean response for each question. The fifth column is labeled 'Standard Deviation' and contains the standard deviation for each question. The sixth column is labeled 'Skewness' and contains the skewness for each question. The seventh column is labeled 'Kurtosis' and contains the kurtosis for each question. The eighth column is labeled 'Normality Test' and contains the results of the normality test for each question. The ninth column is labeled 'Significance Level' and contains the significance level for each question. The tenth column is labeled 'Conclusion' and contains the conclusion for each question.

Figure 1. Figure 1. A plot of $\log_{10}(\text{mass})$ versus $\log_{10}(\text{radius})$ for the 100 most massive stars in the sample. The stars are color-coded by spectral type: O (red), B (orange), A (yellow), F (green), G (blue), K (purple), and M (brown). The stars are sorted by mass, with the most massive stars on the left and the least massive stars on the right. The plot shows a clear trend of decreasing mass with increasing radius, with the most massive stars having the smallest radii and the least massive stars having the largest radii.
